Session Description:
This panel will explore the challenges with maintaining historic neighborhoods with unreinforced masonry buildings that have not been retrofitted. Oftentimes with complex seismic retrofit projects, residents and small businesses are often displaced – sometimes permanently. A large proportion of displaced residents are low to moderate income, and a large proportion of small businesses that are displaced represent woman and minority owned businesses. While a seismic retrofit project has obvious benefits for public health and safety, it does not always account for social health and being able to retain continuity of a community’s most important ingredient – people.
